When hydrogen is used up, the core gets smaller and heats up so that eventually, the shell around the core begins to fuse hydrogen.

During the main period of a star’s lifetime, hydrogen fuses into helium to make energy in the core.

The outer shell layers begin to expand, but since it makes less energy, the star is cooler and has a reddish color. This is where the term Red Giant comes from.